Teaching children to read has been a concern for parents for centuries. In the 19th century, the Spalding Method was developed, which emphasized the phonetic approach to reading. This method, based on the principles of Orton-Gillingham, was designed to teach children to read and spell by breaking words down into their constituent sounds.

The Spalding Method, or the Writing Road to Reading, was developed by Romalda Bishop Spalding and Walter T. Spalding. It is a multi-sensory approach that uses concrete materials and visual aids to teach reading. The program includes a series of books that are designed to help children learn the 44 phonograms and 26 letters of the alphabet, as well as to develop writing skills.

The Spalding Method has been praised for its effectiveness in teaching children to read, but it has also faced criticism for its complexity and the time it takes to complete. Many modern reading programs have evolved from the Spalding Method, incorporating its principles while also adapting to new research findings in the field of reading instruction.

In recent years, there has been a renewed interest in the Spalding Method, with some homeschooling families finding it to be an effective tool for teaching reading and spelling. However, it is important for parents to choose a reading program that is best suited for their child's needs and learning style, whether that be the Spalding Method or another approach.
